Variations in development of phytoplankton and Chlorella vulgaris cells after UV irradiation. This paper presents studies of cell division and viability after UV-B irradiation of an unstructured population of Chlorella vulgaris and its pigment-producing mutant phenotype, using the comet assay as a marker for cell death. Time-course data show that non-UV-B-irradiated cells divide until at least 3 h after the beginning of the experiment. Irradiated cells do not divide until at least 6 h after the beginning of the experiment, and cell division continues much longer in the irradiated cells. During the period of cell division, cells are not viable until at least 36 h after the beginning of the experiment, but cells continue to divide after 36 h in the irradiated population. The minimum cell division time can be linked to the synthesis
